CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE

Lev Blumenfeld is associate professor of linguistics at Carleton University in Ottawa, Canada. He has published on theoretical phonology, the linguistics of verse and, more recently, Micronesian linguistics. He is currently focusing on historical and comparative Micronesian linguistics, with a particular interest in the Nauruan language.

Deirdre Harrison studied archaeology and classical studies in South Africa, where her research focused on Indigenously rock art, Late Stone Age dispersal settlements and ancient Greek vase painting. She is currently the Archaeology Collection Manager at Tāmaki Paenga Hira Auckland War Memorial Museum in Auckland, Aotearoa New Zealand. Her research interests include rock art, Paleolithic and Neolithic population migrations and classical archaeology.

Rowan Light is a historian and lecturer at Waipapa Taumata Rau The University of Auckland and Project Curator (New Zealand Wars) at Tāmaki Paenga Hira Auckland War Memorial Museum. He researches histories of remembrance and commemoration, focusing on how communities respond to war and conflict and how this is shaped by institutions such as memorials and museums. His first book, Anzac Nations: The Legacy of Gallipoli in New Zealand and Australia, 1965–2015, was published with Otago University Press in 2022. A follow-up publication, Why Memory Matters: “Remembered Histories” and the Politics of the Shared Past, was published in 2023 as part of the Bridget Williams Books Texts series.

John Middleton is a lecturer in Te Puna Reo The School of Cultures, Languages and Linguistics at Waipapa Taumata Rau The University of Auckland. He researches Pacific languages, with a focus on syntax and word orders. He has been working on Moriori for three years and previously examined a unique passive construction in the language. He also researches Tokelauan and is especially interested in endangered languages, including revitalisation efforts.

Michael Reilly is a professor in Te Tumu School of Māori, Pacific and Indigenous Studies at Ōtākou Whakaihu Waka The University of Otago, in Ōtepoti Dunedin, Aotearoa New Zealand. With a background in Māori studies and Pacific history, he is principally interested in understanding the ancient Polynesian cultural world through the study of Indigenous traditions, especially those from Aotearoa New Zealand and Mangaia (Cook Islands).

Amy Stewart (Pākehā) is a Tāmaki-based writer and editor. She writes about art for journals such as Art New Zealand and with artists for their individual projects. At Tāmaki Paenga Hira Auckland War Memorial Museum, she writes English-language text for exhibitions and permanent galleries and provides editorial support for Museum staff.

Richard Wolfe has a BFA from the Elam School of Fine Arts and a PhD in art history from Waipapa Taumata Rau The University of Auckland. He was display artist at Canterbury Museum and, from 1978–1997, curator of display at Tāmaki Paenga Hira Auckland War Memorial Museum, of which he is Associate Emeritus (2013). He has written or coauthored over 40 books on aspects of New Zealand art, history, museology and popular culture and is a regular contributor to the quarterly Art New Zealand.
